Herbert Reginbogin

Question about the Universalization of Human Rights – Perspectives of a World Society?

Within a meta-theoretical English School of international relations and critical security study a wide array of issues surrounding the universalization of human rights is investigated. Presented are arguments that a new political economy is emerging where individuals or humans collectively will become the referent of security and thus the protection of cultural identity and the environment. Due to climate change an existential process has begun causing greater adherence to a codex of ethics in international relations and the universalization of human rights. The explanatory research methodology will examine three core areas related to universalization of human rights as it affects world society:

1. Analyze the dynamics of religion, freedom and foreign policy in the liberal international system as Russia challenges them as the guardian of traditional values and its potential fallout on the international system and world society.

2. Define the New Energy Era (political stewardship economy) due to climate change and globalization resulting in specific strategies to promote human security collectively as well as protecting cultural identity as part of the universalization of human rights

3. Develop the necessary tools of statecraft (economic, military, diplomatic, and social,) to make universal human rights a core part of human security.

To celebrate a universalization of human rights in the 21st-century world order the West must find a way to adapt to Russia’s new self-identity role of protecting traditional values with potentially far reaching geopolitical implications. By embracing the implementation of universal human rights principles, faith, freedom and foreign policy will be paired with the recognition of the reality of other regions' histories, cultures and views of their security to bring about the course of consensus to enforce the principles of universal human rights as a sine qua non for a world society to exist in the new millennium of Enlightenment.