

Contents

Preface	i
Acknowledgements	ii
Chronology	7
I Contextual and systematic approaches to understanding philosophy: descriptions, explanations and evaluations	9
II Philosophy as non-religious argumentative reflection on epistemological, moral, and aesthetic issues	15
III Traditional Chinese categories of philosophy	19
III.1 Overview	19
III.2 The name "Confucius"	21
III.3 The label "Confucianism"	22
III.4 The labels dao jia (Daoism), ming jia (School of names), mo jia (Mohism), bing jia (School of War), and fajia (Legalism)	33
III.5 The label fo jia 佛家 (Buddhism)	37
IV A note on Leibniz's approach to an understanding of Chinese philosophy	41
IV.1 The lasting significance of Leibniz's approach	41
IV.2 Over-generalization, universalization, facts and norms, so-called cultural identity, and universal ethics	41
IV.3 Leibniz and the Novissima Sinica	42

V The beginnings of philosophy in Chinese history: the theory of legitimate rule. Also an example of philosophical poetry	45
VI Logic, epistemology, and philosophy of language: the sources, structures, and verbal expressions of valid knowledge	65
VI.1 The issue of 'Chinese' logic	65
VI.2 Principles of non-contradiction, valid inference and other basic logical rules in the history of logical thought in China	67
VI.2.1 Usage of the word "logic" and application of the word "logic" to Chinese thought	67
VI.2.2 Basic logical principles	69
VI.2.2.1 The principle of identity	69
VI.2.2.2 The principle of non-contradiction	72
VI.2.2.3 The tertium non datur or law of excluded middle	76
VI.2.2.4 The principle of transitivity and the Dictum de omni et nullo	78
VI.3 Problems and controversies	83
VI.3.1 Reading 'Western logic' into 'Chinese logic'? Standards of studies in intercultural logic	83
VI.3.2 Terminological questions	84
VI.3.3 No logic in China before the introduction of 'Western' logic?	86
VI.3.4 Comparison of Zen and Aristotelian logic? Only what belongs to the same kind should be compared with each other	87
VI.3.5 No 'logic proper,' but a mix of ontology, epistemology, theory of argumentation, religion, and logic?	87
VI.3.6 Symbolic, formal, and material logic	88
VI.3.7 Is 'Chinese logic' a function of the Chinese language?	89
VI.3.8 Denial of the tertium non datur	90
VI.3.9 Is yinming logic merely inductive?	91

VI.3.10 Argumentation in the Mengzi : Analogical, but rarely logical reasoning?	92
VI.3.10.1 The problem	92
VI.3.10.2 The logical structure of Mencius' argument for justifying tyrannicide	93
VI.3.10.3 The logical structure of the Mencian argument that human nature is something inherent in humans	95
VI.3.10.4 The logical structure of the Mencian argument that human nature is good	97
VI.3.10.5 The rule that identical premises should lead to identical conclusions	100
VI.3.10.6 Tertium non datur and negation in the Mencius	101
VI.3.10.7 Paradoxes	102
VI.3.10.8 A final word on (the usage of) analogies and on the relevance of analyzing 'Mencian' logic	102
VI.3.11 Reflections on logic in the Mencius and the Mozi from transcultural perspectives	104
VI.3.12 Commonalities and differences. The issue of one universal logic and many different logics	108
VI.4 Hypothetical conclusions	118
VII Ethics, social and political philosophy. Or how to behave as individual, social and political being	119
VII.1 Overview	119
VII.2 Humane rule and moral autonomy	121
VII.3 Human dignity and human rights	122
VII.3 Ontology, epistemology, and problems of normativity	127
VII.4 Suicide as a means to preserve one's dignity	129
VII.5 Towards a universally valid norm that human dignity ought not to be violated	133
VII.6 Classic rufia philosophy of criticism: an important contribution to a valid theory of humaneness	139

VII.6.1	The main features of the rujia concept of criticism	139
VII.6.2	Criticism as an indispensable element of human life	140
VII.6.3	Significance of the topic	141
VII.6.4	Classical Chinese expressions for words like “to criticize” and “criticism”	142
VII.6.5	Aims of criticism	142
VII.6.6	Contents, topics and issues of criticism	144
VII.6.7	Methods of criticism	144
VII.6.8	Abuse and perversion	146
VII.6.9	Some speculations about a general theory of criticism	149
VII.7	From Marx and Engels to Sino-Marxism. Focusing on Communist and classic rujia notions of loyalty and self-criticism	151
VII.7.1	Some basic teachings of Marx and Engels	151
VII.7.2	Characteristics of Sino-Marxism	152
VII.7.3	General features of Marxism that explain its success	153
VII.7.4	Chinese disputes about the relation between general ethical or social norms and Marxism	154
VII.7.5	Particular features of Marxism that explain its success	155
VII.7.6	Li Zehou’s humanist Sino-Marxism	161
VII.7.7	Socialist materialism as materialist capitalism?	163
VIII	Philosophy of art or the principle of natural preformation: a contribution to aesthetics	165
VIII.1	A notion of transcultural philosophical aesthetics	165
VIII.2	Aesthetic judgment, aesthetic predicates, and properties of beauty	169
VIII.3	Human behavior shows: Human beings believe in the universality of beauty	173
VIII.4	The beauty of art works: seeming naturalness, ‘realism,’ and originality	176

VIII.5	Criticism and derogation of beauty	183
VIII.5.1	Criticism of undistinguishableness of art and reality, ways in which artists try to preclude this criticism, and the (in)capability to adequately judge art	183
VIII.5.2	Other kinds of criticism	192
VIII.6	Human beings are interested in beauty	192
VIII.7	The case of human beauty	199
	Digression: Strange fashions reflecting both general and particular ideas of beauty	202
VIII.8	How beautiful jade became beautiful art ...	210
VIII.8.1	The principle of natural preformation of beautiful art	210
VIII.8.2	The idea of natural preformation as an important specification of universally valid notions of beauty and beautiful art	216
VIII.8.3	Jade as beautiful material for creating beautiful art	217
VIII.8.4	Sculptures indicative of a utilization of the principle of natural preformation	218
VIII.8.4.1	An example from the Palaeolithic	221
VIII.8.4.2	Examples from folk art	221
VIII.8.4.3	Works by Chinese artisans	225
VIII.8.4.4	Chinese jade carvings	227
VIII.8.5	The theory of natural preformation in Chinese history	231
VIII.8.6	What do we lose when insisting that beautiful works ought (also) to be of epistemic, moral, or social significance, and that only what is of such significance ought to be regarded as an object of pleasure?	234
VIII.9	Putting into practice political philosophy: power and art in Chinese history	235
VIII.9.1	The issue	235
VIII.9.2	Temptation of power	241
VIII.9.3	Questions	245

VIII.9.4 Theories of committed art and iconoclasm	248
VIII.9.5 Architecture as manifestation and execution of power	251
VIII.9.6 Axiality and framing	257
VIII.9.7 One more note on iconoclasm	269
VIII.9.8 Self-portraits as self-criticism	270
VIII.9.9 After Mao	271
VIII.9.10 Literary criticism of rulership	280
VIII.9.11 Recalling cultural concurrences and differences	283
IX In place of a conclusion	285
Notes	289
References	333
Index	359